

Statistical Studies: Statistical Investigations
 III.A Student Activity Sheet 4: Sampling Design and Methods

Recall the Spud Potato Chips scenario from Student Activity Sheet 1. You hypothesized that the true mean weight of bags of Spud’s might be less than the 28.3 grams advertised on the bags. Discuss and make some notes on how you might collect a sample of bags to test your hypothesis. Remember that the sample should be representative of the population. What do you mean by “the population of Spud Potato Chips” that you are interested in testing?

This leads to another circular relationship. You want to know something about a population. You choose a sampling method and obtain a sample. Collecting data from the sample provides some sort of estimate or conclusion about the population of interest.

It may seem that the hard work in statistical investigations comes during data collection. Notice, however, that the other four boxes in the research cycle are the same size as the Collect box—they require the same time and attention as the actual data collection.

In particular, researchers cannot skimp on the time and care given to planning sample selection. If the sample is not representative of your population, the results may be worthless!
