Abstract—The substantive aim of this study was to investigate the favorable and unfavorable study habits and study attitudes of the freshmen students and determine its implications in formulating academic intervention programs. The Survey of Study Habits and Attitudes (SSHA) instrument developed by Brown and Holtzman (1969) was used to assess the study habits and attitudes of the students. Results show that students generally do not approve teacher methods and classroom management, and have inefficient time management. Favorable and unfavorable study habits and attitudes of the students were also revealed. Implications of these findings were discussed and the theory of confluent education was considered in designing a framework of academic intervention programs among HEIs.

Index Terms—study habits, study attitudes, study orientation, academic achievement, academic intervention programs, confluent education

I. INTRODUCTION

A great deal of research literature provides an evidence that study habits and study attitudes are both significant variables which determine the academic performance of students [3, 5, 9, 12, 15]. Yet, in spite of the perceived importance of study habits and study attitudes to educational achievement, very little attention were given by academic institutions to improve these factors. This is manifested from the very low understanding level and the equally poor and deteriorating knowledge of many students which is still a great concern of educators, parents and governments [15]. This problem is pointed out by Huriburt, et.al [8] as contextual and systemic; it is rooted in the educational process shared by students and schools.

Consequently, the need to improve student's study habits and attitudes is deemed necessary to improve student's academic achievement. Accordingly, it is essential for schools to determine factors which affect these characteristics adversely propose remedial measures and employ strategies for the development of good study habits and study attitudes [9]. This is further supported by Huriburt, et.al [8] from their study which suggested that a confluent educational philosophy (systemic and holistic) and using confluent educational strategies (through which students' social-emotional and personal empowerment needs are met) may enhance the school experience, improve study habits and attitudes, and ameliorate the high dropout rate among the students.

The premise that improving study habits and attitudes will lead to academic success, this study is conducted. It aimed to provide comparison data on the study habits and attitudes of the high achievers and underachievers and consider the implications of these findings in designing academic intervention programs. This will lead to the identification of negative study habits of students which may affect their educational achievement. Understanding these negative characteristics will help lay the foundation of developing academic intervention programs as implications of confluent educational strategies that will help develop good study habits and study attitudes among the students [15].

Very few studies have compared the study orientation (study habits and attitudes) possessed by different groups of college students, such as those with high GPAs versus low GPAs. The study of Proctor, et. al [14] signified the importance of this line of research for several reasons. They pointed out that identifying characteristics that differentiate among groups of students would be helpful to know in which areas certain groups of students are likely to require remediation. In addition, acknowledging all of the variables that differentiate between high- and low-performing students furthers theoretical understanding of why some students succeed in college while others fail. Accordingly, this expanded understanding of all the factors that contribute to college success (and failure). This is important for the purposes of prediction (e.g., of who is likely to succeed in college) [5, 12], identification (e.g., of students in need of intervention), and remediation (e.g., of skills that can be improved and have been linked to academic success) [14].

A review of literature reveals methods that will improve student's study habits and attitudes. Table 1 presents these strategies which congruently describes approaches to confluent education.
