

Evolution of India's China Policy

JOHN W. GARVER

THINKING THROUGH THE UPHEAVAL, 1949–53

Three trends operating at the international system-level of analysis deeply influenced the China policy of newly independent India. First, the decisive victory of the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) in China's civil war led to the establishment in October 1949 of the People's Republic of China (PRC) as a Leninist–Stalinist style state that effectively united China for the first time in decades. That new Chinese state quickly eliminated the Tibetan buffer that had for centuries separated China and India, thereby destroying a central element of the China policy that independent India inherited from Britain.

Second, the accelerating collapse of the European colonial empires that had organized world power over the previous several centuries led to the entry of growing numbers of newly independent Asian and African nations onto the world stage. The collapse of the Japanese empire that had dominated East Asia and the British empire that had dominated South Asia posed the question of what sort of international order would replace those old imperial systems, or more specifically, what roles newly liberated India and China would play in the emerging post-colonial world.

The third trend was the onset of the Cold War between the Soviet and US-led camps, and the expansion of that Cold War to Asia circa 1950. This raised the prospect that Asia's post-colonial order would be defined by the United States (US)–Soviet struggle, with India's efforts to shape the new Asia free of Western domination being overwhelmed by the battles of the American and Soviet superpowers. From India's perspective, both the US and Russia were essentially Western powers.

The collapse of colonial empires paralleled by the onset of the Cold War presented both opportunities and dangers for India's national policies. India's leaders felt that India was a leader of the 'newly emerging nations'
