Efficient Frameworks for Keyword Search on Massive Graphs Jiaxin Jiang,2020 Due to the unstructuredness and the lack of schema information of knowledge graphs social networks and RDF graphs keyword search has been proposed for querying such graphs networks Recently various keyword search semantics have been designed However these keyword search semantics and algorithms encounter efficiency or scalability issues In this thesis we propose new three generic frameworks or index techniques to address these issues The thesis results show that the keyword search on massive graphs under different scenarios can be effective and efficient which would facilitate keyword search services on graphs in the real world First we study the keyword search on massive knowledge graphs In particular we propose a generic ontology based indexing framework for keyword search called Bisimulation of Generalized Graph Index BiG index to enhance the search performance The novelties of BiG index reside in using an ontology graph G_{Ont} to summarize and index a data graph G iteratively to form a hierarchical index structure G Regarding query evaluation we transform a keyword search q into Q according to G_{Ont} in runtime The transformed query is searched on the summary graphs in G The efficiency is due to the small sizes of the summary graphs and the early pruning of semantically irrelevant subgraphs To illustrate BiG index s applicability we show popular indexing techniques for keyword search can be easily implemented on top of BiG index Our extensive experiments show that BiG index clearly reduced the runtimes of popular keyword search algorithms Second we study the problem of

keyword search on public private graph In many applications e g social networks users may prefer to hide parts or all of her his data graphs e g private friendships from the public This leads to a recent graph model namely the public private network model in which each user has his her own network While there have been studies on public private network analysis keyword search on public private networks has not yet been studied Hence we propose a new keyword search framework called public private keyword search PPKWS PPKWS consists of three major steps partial evaluation answer refinement and answer completion We select three representative ones and show that they can be implemented on the model with minor modifications We propose indexes and optimizations for PPKWS We have verified through experiments that on average the algorithms implemented on top of PPKWS run 113 times faster than the original algorithms directly running on the public network attached to the private network for retrieving answers that span through them Third we study the keyword search in distributed graph evaluation systems In the recent research on query evaluation parallel evaluation has attracted much interest However the study on keyword search on distributed graphs has still been limited We propose a novel distributed keyword search framework called DKWS We propose a notify push paradigm which can exchange the upper bounds of answers across all the workers asynchronously In particular the workers notify the coordinator when the local upper bound is refined The coordinator pushes the refined global upper bound to all the workers Moreover we propose an efficient and generic keyword search algorithm for the workers We have implemented DKWS on top of GRAPE a distributed graph process system from our previous research collaboration Extensive experimental results show that DKWS outperforms current state of art techniques
