

Cell Biology - Chapter 11 - Signaling Cells

This chapter is difficult to produce and covered in your laboratory's biology course. If you reading this chapter at least once and get a really good idea about the key concepts related to it then that should be good for the readings, textbook figures and exercises.

1. What is signal?

Information that is sent from one cell to another.

2. What is cellular signaling?

The process by which a cell receives information from its environment and responds to it.

3. Describe the following types of cell signaling:

- a. Contact Signaling: Cells that are in direct contact with each other. Signaling molecules are released from one cell and bind to receptors on the surface of the adjacent cell. Examples include gap junctions and hemidesmosomes.
- b. Paracrine Signaling: Signaling molecules released by one cell and bind to receptors on the surface of nearby cells. Examples include neurotransmitters and hormones.
- c. Endocrine Signaling: Signaling molecules released by one cell and travel through the bloodstream to bind to receptors on the surface of distant cells. Examples include insulin and testosterone.
- d. Synaptic Signaling: Signaling molecules released by one cell and bind to receptors on the surface of another cell. Examples include neurotransmitters and hormones.

4. What is signal transduction?

The process by which a signal molecule binds to a receptor and activates a signaling pathway that leads to a specific cellular response.

5. Describe the different types of signal receptors and signaling pathways.

There are three main types of signal receptors: ion channel receptors, G-protein coupled receptors, and receptor tyrosine kinases. Each type of receptor activates a different signaling pathway that leads to a specific cellular response.

6. What is the purpose of a signaling pathway?

To transmit information from the cell surface to the interior of the cell, where it can be used to regulate cellular processes.
