

Normal Gas Mileage

An automobile manufacturer is designing a new midsize car. You are asked to gather some information about the competition. To the right is a plot and below are summary statistics of the highway gas mileage of 22 competitors' midsize cars.

Variable	N	Mean	Median	TrMean	StDev	SEMean
Mileage	22	30.182	30.5	30.76	4.3930	0.9366
Variable	Min	Max	Q1	Q3

a) Describe the distribution of highway gas mileage for the sample of competitor's midsize cars.

Many statistical procedures require that a population be approximately normal. One of your colleagues is concerned that this sample does not appear to have come from a population that is approximately normal. She says that the vehicle that gets 18 miles per gallon is too far from the rest of the data points for this sample to have come from an approximately normal population.

b) A  $z$ -score is one measure of how extreme a point is. Calculate the  $z$ -score for the car that gets 18 mpg.

c) Another measure of extremity would be the number IQRs the point is from the median. Calculate this value for the car that gets 18 mpg.

By itself, neither of those numbers is a good indicator of whether the population from which this sample was taken might be approximately normal. To see what would be expected when sampling from a normal population, your colleague ran a simulation. She selected 22 cases and calculated the number of IQRs from the median for the most extreme point (always using the absolute value of the difference). She did this for 200 sets of 22 points. The results are shown below.

d) Using your answer to part c and the plot above, comment on whether your sample seems to have come from a normal distribution.
