Transcription factors play a key role in the regulation of gene expression. They bind to specific DNA sequences and control the rate at which genes are transcribed into mRNA. This process is called transcription. The binding of transcription factors to DNA is a reversible process, and it can be regulated by a variety of factors, including hormones, growth factors, and environmental signals. This allows cells to respond to changes in their environment and to regulate gene expression in a precise and controlled manner. Transcription factors are also involved in the regulation of gene expression during development.
