Guided Notes: Weathering, Erosion, & Deposition

WORD BANK: weathering, erosion, transport, weathering, Mechanical Weathering, Deposition, Chemical Weathering, Compaction, Ice Wedging, Sediment, Glacier

Weathering is the breakdown of rock material by physical and chemical processes. Temperature changes, pressure changes, plant and animal actions, water, wind, and gravity all contribute to mechanical weathering, which breaks rocks down into smaller pieces. When water collects in cracks in rocks and freezes, it expands, causing the crack to get larger. This is called ice wedging.

Rocks can react with oxygen and certain acids. This can change both the appearance and composition of the rock. This process is called chemical weathering. When weathering occurs by a living thing, such as plant roots growing, we refer to it as biological weathering.

Sediment is tiny grains of broken-down rock. The process that moves sediment and other materials from one place to another is called erosion. This can cause changes to landscapes by causing streams to widen and deepen. Erosion can also form canyons and valleys, as well as coastal landforms like sea cliffs, sea caves, and sea arches.

Wind, ice, and gravity can also cause erosion. Wind can erode deserts and remove the top layer of fine sediment, soil or sand. Glaciers are large masses of moving ice. As they move, glaciers scratch the surface, causing erosion. Gravity contributes to erosion by directing the flow of water and other materials.

After erosion occurs, the sediment and other eroded material eventually come to rest. The process by which weathered and eroded material is dropped by wind, water, or ice is called deposition. Deposition can cause the formation of floodplains, deltas, beaches, and sand dunes.

A pattern of ecosystems with combinations of soil and landforms that characterize a large area is known as an ecoregion. All of the processes listed above, such as weathering, erosion, and deposition, help contribute to making each ecoregion unique. Texas has 10 different ecoregions. Where we live, in Dallas, is located in the Blackland Prairies ecoregion.
