Abstract - In recent times, Flat slab buildings are generally used for the construction because use of flat slab building provides many advantages above conventional RC Frame building in terms of economy, make use of space, easier formwork, architectural flexibility and mostly shorter construction time. The structural effectiveness of the Flat slab construction is mainly difficult by its meager performance under earthquake loading. It is essential to analyze seismic behavior of buildings to observe what are the changes are going to arise for the conventional RC frame building, flat slab building with and without shear wall respectively. The analysis is done with STAAD .PRO V8i software. The characteristics seismic behavior of conventional RC frame building, flat slab buildings imply that supplementary measures for guiding the formation and design of these structures in seismic regions are desirable and to increase the performance of building having conventional RC building, flat slabs under seismic loading. The object of the present study covers the behavior of multi-storey buildings having conventional RC slab building, flat slabs and to study the performance of these types of buildings under seismic forces. Current study covers information on the parameters storey drift, lateral displacement, seismic base shear, storey shear.

Key Words: Flat Slabs, RC Frame building, storey drift, lateral displacement, Storey shear, Seismic Base shear, STAAD.PRO.

1. INTRODUCTION

India at present is fastest growing country in economy which brings demands in rising of infrastructure amenities along with the development of population. The demand of property in urban areas is rising day by day, in order to neutralize this demand in these urban areas erect development is the only option. This type of development brings challenges to neutralize extra lateral loads due to wind and earthquake.

Widespread practice of design and construction is to maintain the slabs by beams and support the beams by columns. This may be called as beam slab construction. The depth of beams decreases the existing net clear ceiling height. Hence in offices, community halls and houses, occasionally beams are avoided and slabs are directly supported on columns. These types of construction develop the visual manifestation. These slabs which are directly supported on columns are called Flat slabs. These flat slabs are also called as beamless slabs. The part of slab surrounded on each of the four sides by centre line of column is called panel. Panel is divided into column stripe and middle stripe. The flat slab is thickened congested to supporting columns to provide tolerable strength in shear and to ease the amount of negative reinforcement.

In 1914 Eddy and Turner were first to write on flat slabs. The flat slabs directly rest on columns and walls above added forms of construction and advantages are enhanced lightning, cheaper cost, better efficiency of appearance, speed of construction and improved safety is unanimously accepted as to render any consistent information related to the precise computation of stresses in flat slab-construction is of enormous interest.

The research has been carried out to discover the behavior of slab column connection. The failure approach depends leading the type and degree of loading. Punching shear strength of slab column connection is of significance which depends on the gravity shear ratio. The system of transfer of moments from slab to column is very composite when subjected to lateral loading and unstable moments. These unstable moments produce further shear and torsion at the connections and then get transfer into the column which consequences in unnecessary cracking of slab leading to further decline in the stiffness of the slab.

A shear wall is a structural system composed of parallel walls that oppose the effects of lateral loads applied on a structure. Wind and seismic loads are mainly applied that shear walls are designed to carry.

Shear walls are not only designed to resist gravity/ vertical loads (due to self-weight and other living/ moving loads), but they are also designed for lateral loads due to earthquakes / winds. The walls are structurally included with roofs / floors and other lateral walls consecutively at right angles, thus giving the three dimensional stability to the building. Walls are made to
