Zero Day Attacks

- Answer An attacker will exploit a vulnerability in an operating system or a network security device in such a way that makes it almost impossible to defend against.

Because of this, zero-day attacks are a severe threat. Actually, most vulnerabilities are discovered through zero-day attacks, and the first group of systems that are attacked have very little defense. But once the attack is detected, the development of a solution is not far behind (it could be days or even hours); the vulnerability (and attack) becomes known and is no longer zero-day.

Zombies

- Answer computers that distribute the malware or participate in an attack without the knowledge of the owner. These zombies (or robots) can be grouped together by a central attacker to form a botnet. This is done to perpetuate large-scale attacks against particular servers. The distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) is an example of an attack committed by a botnet; it is designed to bring down a server or website.
