

Samuel P. Huntington, Political Order in Changing Societies (2006 [1968])

Political Order in Changing Societies emerged against the intellectual trend towards modernization theory in the post-War period. Modernization theory, whether it in the form of the Rostovian take-off model, or links between democratization and modernization examined by scholars such as Dapid Apter, generally regarded being modern as a good thing. Economic development would lead to increased education and the emergence of modern values such as rationalism and secularism, allowing corresponding political development. Modernization theory of course became a target for a wide range of criticisms. Some viewed it as an ahistorical attempt to impose a Western version of "modernity" on the world. Others looked to world systems theories or dependency theory to explain "underdevelopment" in the non-Western world. In contrast, Huntington challenged modernization theory from a conservative perspective.

Huntington noted that during the 1950s and 1960s political violence and disorder actually increased dramatically. The period was marked, not by political development, but by "political decay." Contrary to the expectations of modernization theory, this "violence and instability" was "in a large part the product of rapid social change and the rapid mobilization of new groups into politics coupled with the slow development of political institutions (p. 4)." In many Asian, African, and Latin American countries "[t]he rates of social mobilization and the expansion of political participation are high; the rates of political organization and institutionalization are low. The result is political instability and disorder. The primary problem is the lag in the
