Two studies were conducted to analyze how hope, resilience, optimism, and efficacy individually and as a composite higher-order factor predicted work performance and satisfaction. Results from Study 1 provided psychometric support for a new survey measure designed to assess each of these 4 facets, as well as a composite factor. Study 2 results indicated a significant positive relationship regarding the composite of these 4 facets with performance and satisfaction. Results from Study 2 also indicated that the composite factor may be a better predictor of performance and satisfaction than the 4 individual facets. Limitations and practical implications conclude the article.

In a special issue of the American Psychologist, Sheldon and King (2001, p. 216) point out that "Positive psychology revisits the 'average person' with an interest in finding out what works, what is right, and what is improving." Like positive psychology, which does not claim to have discovered the importance of positivity (e.g., see Peterson, 2006), the recently emerging positive organizational behavior field recognizes that much of the early history (e.g., Herzberg, 1966; Maslow, 1954; McGregor, 1960) and contemporary theories and research (e.g., job satisfaction, organizational commitment, positive affectivity, core self-evaluations, organizational citizenship, intrinsic motivation, humor, self-determination, organizational justice, among others) are positively oriented. Nevertheless, analogous to, and drawing from, the positive psychology literature, the term positive organizational behavior is intended to

Positive Psychology Studies in Education Abdolvahab Samavi, Lourdes Rey, Hassan Khezri, Beatrice Ifeoma Ajufo, Samaneh - Najarpourian, 2022-10-07 Community Series in the Consequences of COVID-19 on the Mental Health of Students - Volume II Haibo Yang, Li Wang, Chang Liu, 2023-06-01 An Examination of the Stability of Positive Psychological Capital Using Frequency-based Measurement Elizabeth Anne McGee, 2011 The purpose of this study was to explore the utility of frequency based measurement as an alternative method for examining the stability of psychological capital a higher order construct introduced by Luthans and colleagues 2007 consisting of self efficacy hope resilience and optimism Frequency based measurement is a new approach based on the distributional assessment model Kane 1986 2000 that provides information on the relative frequency of occurrence for specific behaviors over a given period of time and offers a distribution that depicts the scope of an individual's behavior. One advantage of this approach is that it can provide information on a person's behavior over time in a single administration, allowing researchers to examine the temporal stability of constructs without having to conduct longitudinal studies, e.g., personality (Edwards, Woehr, 2007). To investigate the usefulness of this new approach, a series of studies was conducted using a sample of students from a large southeastern university. The first study compared a frequency-based measure of psychological capital to the more traditional Likert-type measure. Results indicated that the two are equivalent measures of the central tendency of psychological capital. The frequency-based measure was also compared to the Likert-type measure given across three contexts: family, school, and social settings. In a second study, results indicated that the two approaches offered similar information in terms of consistency with both approaches, demonstrating some variability in responses over time or across contexts. Thus, this study provided further evidence that frequency-based measurement offers additional information not available in a single administration using a Likert-type measure. The last study investigated agreement between an individual's self-reported psychological capital and ratings of their psychological capital given by an acquaintance. Contrary to my expectations, within-item consistency did not moderate self-other agreement. The implications of these findings are outlined in addition to suggestions for future research.
