Blood and Iron

Prussian legislation called for unity for the new Germany to be based on the Prussian state. Bismarck wanted to build a unified Germany on a common German blood and iron. Bismarck's motto was "Blood and Iron." The great question of the day was not to be decided by speeches and majority resolutions—that was the mistake of 1848 and 1849—but by blood and iron.

—Otto von Bismarck, 1862

Over time, Bismarck followed his "blood and iron" approach to unify Germany. He used the force of the new Prussian policies. Bismarck was determined to build a strong, unified German state, with Prussia at the head.

Taking Initial Steps Toward Unity

In the early 1800s, German-speaking people lived in a number of small and medium-sized states as well as in Prussia and the two large neighboring empires. Napoleon's armies had reduced most states to these territories.

Napoleon Built German Land Between 1806 and 1807, Napoleon made important territorial changes in German-speaking lands. He created the Rhine Confederation from the states of the Holy Roman Empire by forcing the emperor of Austria to agree to the Treaty of Pressburg. He also organized a number of German principalities into the Rhine Confederation.

At first, some German principalities joined Napoleon as allies with enlightened, modern policies. The enlightened thinking that swept across Europe during the 1700s and 1800s had inspired the people. Many people thought that the changes in Prussia were a good thing. They began to demand a unified German state.

Napoleon's defeat did not mean the end for the Congress of Vienna. Congress set the government of each German state. Bismarck, the government created the German Confederation, a weak alliance headed by Austria.

Master of Realpolitik Bismarck's success was due in part to his strong will. He was a master of Realpolitik (ray-uh-lee-uh-tyk). He made realistic goals and used the means to achieve them. For the sake of Realpolitik, power was more important than principles.

Although Bismarck was the architect of German unity, he was not really a German nationalist. His primary loyalty was to the Hohenzollern family and their country. His vision of Germany was not a political, traditional, or ethnic one. Through realpolitik, he hoped to bring more power to the Hohenzollerns.

Strengthening the Army As Prussia's prime minister, Bismarck first worked to build up the Prussian army. Despite his "blood and iron" approach, the Prussian legislature refused to vote for funds for the military. In response, Bismarck allowed himself to be elected as a member of the legislature for other purposes. With a powerful, well-equipped military, he was able to force the legislature to approve his foreign policy. Over the next decade, Bismarck built Prussia's army into a force that surpassed France in power and prestige and proved that unity for the Germans was possible.

Prussia Declares War With Denmark and Austria Bismarck's first successful war to force an alliance in 1864 with Austria. Prussia and Austria then forced the province of Schleswig and Holstein from Denmark. After a brief war, Prussia and Austria "divided" the two provinces and divided up the spoils. Austria was to administer Schleswig and Prussia was to administer Holstein.

In 1866, Bismarck convinced an emperor to attack Austria. The Austro-Prussian War lasted just seven weeks and resulted in a decisive Prussian victory. France was neutral, so the result of several other wars, German unity.

Bismarck dissolved the Austrian-led German Confederation and created a new confederation dominated by Prussia. Austria still had some influence in the new confederation. Bismarck's success, at all times, was always more obvious. Although to conquer Austria might have seemed a long and risky war for Prussia.

War and Peace
