SHORT-ANSWER QUESTIONS

 4-1 In a job costing system, shared indirect costs of customization are assigned to a distinct unit, batch, or product or service. In a process costing system there is little or no distinction among outputs. The cost of a product or service is obtained by using broad averages to assign costs to masses of similar outputs.

 4-2 Separating manufacturing overhead (MOH) into more than one cost pool may allow for better representation of cost and benefit. Sometimes this type of refinement reveals direct cause and effect relationships between a single MOH cost pool and a single cost driver. Where indirect inputs are shared unequally among distinct types of products, refining a single MOH cost pool into several may improve the accuracy of output costing, pricing, and prediction of profitability.

 4-3 An advertising campaign for Pepsi is likely to be very specific to that individual client. Job costing requires that all the specific aspects of each distinct job be identified. In contrast, the processing of chequing account deposits is similar for almost all transactions. Here, process costing can be used to compute the cost of each chequing account deposit.

 4-4 The seven steps in job costing are: (1) identify the job that is the chosen cost object, (2) identify the direct costs of the job, (3) select the cost-allocation bases to use for allocating indirect costs to the job, (4) identify the indirect costs associated with each cost-allocation base, (5) compute the rate per unit of each cost-allocation base used to allocate indirect costs to the job, (6) compute the indirect costs allocated to the job, and (7) compute the total cost of the job by adding all direct and indirect costs assigned to the job.

 4-5 Two major types of organizational elements that managers focus on in companies using job costing are (1) products or services (outputs), and (2) responsibility centres or departments (inputs).
