

The Changing Face of America

1960-2000

All the rest of the 20th century, the U.S. population grew more slowly than in either the 1950s or the 1960s.

1960-2000

Democracy in all environments. More political power. The focus on equal rights and economic opportunity.

1960-2000

Urban flight
-urbanization
-suburbanization

Class: American History

There was a major shift in the 1960s towards a more urban and suburban population. The majority of the urban population, among other things, were children of African descent and spent the majority of their lives in urban areas. The majority of the suburban population, on the other hand, were white and spent the majority of their lives in suburban areas. This led to a major shift in the way that the government viewed urban and suburban areas, as well as the way that the government viewed the rights of its citizens.

During the 1960s, the government began to focus on the needs of its urban and suburban citizens. The government began to provide more services to its urban citizens, such as housing, education, and job training. The government also began to provide more services to its suburban citizens, such as housing, education, and job training. This led to a major shift in the way that the government viewed its citizens, as well as the way that the government viewed the rights of its citizens.

A. Political View of Urbanization

The government had only recently begun to provide services to its urban citizens, but it is clear that the government was not yet ready to provide services to its suburban citizens. The government was still focused on providing services to its urban citizens, and it was not yet ready to provide services to its suburban citizens.

Urbanization and suburbanization in the 1960s

There were also major shifts in the way that the government viewed its citizens. The government was still focused on providing services to its urban citizens, and it was not yet ready to provide services to its suburban citizens. This led to a major shift in the way that the government viewed its citizens, as well as the way that the government viewed the rights of its citizens.

Urban Flight

There was a major shift in the way that the government viewed its citizens. The government was still focused on providing services to its urban citizens, and it was not yet ready to provide services to its suburban citizens. This led to a major shift in the way that the government viewed its citizens, as well as the way that the government viewed the rights of its citizens.
