Economic Behavior and Rationality

In Chapter 1, we defined economic actors, or economic agents, as people or organizations engaged in any of the four essential economic activities: production, distribution, consumption, and resource maintenance. Economic actors can be individuals, small groups (such as a family or a group of roommates), or large organizations such as a government agency or a multinational corporation. Economics is about how these actors behave and interact as they engage in economic activities. In this chapter we explore the behavior of individual economic actors—people. We look at contemporary research on this topic, and, where it seems relevant, compare this with older approaches.

1. ECONOMIC UNDERSTANDINGS OF HUMAN MOTIVATIONS

Economics is a social science—it is about people and about how we organize ourselves to meet our needs and enhance our well-being. Ultimately, all economic behavior is human behavior. Sometimes institutional forces appear to take over (witness the tendency of some bureaucracies to expand over time), but if you look closely at any economic outcomes, you will find that they are ultimately determined by human decisions or behavior. Thus economists have traditionally used, as a starting point, some kind of statement about the motivations behind economic actions.

1.1 CLASSICAL ECONOMIC VIEWS OF HUMAN NATURE

In Chapter 5, we mentioned Adam Smith's concept of the invisible hand, according to which people acting in their own self-interest would, through markets, promote the general welfare. The concept of the invisible hand has become very famous, but it is often taken out of context to mean that if people only behave with self-interest, they will do what is best for the entire society.

This interpretation would have astonished Smith, who, before writing An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, had written another long book, The Theory of Moral Sentiments, in which he examined with care how people are motivated. His emphasis there is on the desire of people to have self-respect and the respect of others. He assumes that such respect depends on people acting honorably, justly, and with concern and empathy for others in their community. Smith recognizes that selfish desires play a large role but believes that they will be held in check both by the "moral sentiments" (the universal desire for self-respect and the respect of others) and also by the fortunate accident by which "in many cases" (not all!) selfish acts can "promote the public interest."¹

Thus Smith's vision of human nature and human motivation was one in which individual self-interest was mixed with more social motives. Rather than starting with Robinson Crusoe, who lived alone on an island, he perceived that the behavior of any one person always had to be understood within that person's social context.
