

Capital Punishment

Article two of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights states that all humans, no matter their age, gender, race or religion are entitled to those rights allocated to them as a human being. A human right is defined as a right that is believed to belong to each and every person, and effects different aspects of peoples lives in different ways. Although this definition, due to the vast variety of opinion and thought throughout the world and its states it is a complicated process to come to agreement on human rights. The United Nations, which is a collective of almost all states, works to make the world a better place in its different parts. In 1948 it established the Universal Declaration of Human rights, which outline 30 basic entitlements every human being deserves. These include everything from the right to freedom, to the right of thought. Capital punishment, however, is not on this list.

Capital punishment defined is the "legally authorised killing of someone as punishment of a crime" and has been a form of punishment in different societies for thousands of years. The topic of capital punishment is one that has been controversial in different countries amongst its citizens, and certainly between different countries. Because of this characteristic, capital punishment is in fact legal in many states around the world, despite different groups of people's strong opposition to it. There have been successes and failures in an attempt by the UN to completely abolish capital punishment through the world, and with the high majority of countries now turning away of the sanction it is achieving its goal. As of now, 103 countries have completely abolished capital punishment, 6 have abolished except for in exceptional circumstances and 50 have abolished it in practice by not using it for 10 years, or being held under a moratorium. According to Amnesty International, in 2013,
