

STUDY ON THE ACTION OF TACTILE AND STRENGTH SENSORS IN DETERMINING THE BALL FORCE ON THE VOLLEYBALLERS' FOREARMS

Carmen PÂRVU

University "Dunărea de Jos" of Galați, Romania

Abstract

In the previous issues of the magazine we described the computerized apparatus for the acquisition and assessment of the two-handed pass from below in volleyball, stressing the typology and efficiency of the sensors that constitute the hardware of the apparatus.

The present paper aims at analysing the strength sensor, evincing its utility in executing the pass and in the takeover from attack and service.

To develop the project "Computerized apparatus for the acquisition and assessment of the two-handed pass from below", efforts were made to detect and measure the ball force exercised on the player's forearms in executing the takeover from attack and service. Thus, it may be assessed if the forces are equal on both forearms at the moment the ball is hit.

Key words: Sensors, force, volleyball, forearms.

INTRODUCTION

In the early stages of acquisition of a new technical procedure, the formation of the psycho-motor representation is accompanied by major biomechanic deviations from the model. It is the topic of a lot of research trying to prevent and eliminate the most serious deviations which prove harmful by denaturing the form and the content of the motor form.

CONTENT

The analysis of specialised literature in the field (Larionescu, 2012) led to the conclusion that a thorough examination of a technical procedure means dividing it into its components, to be analysed separately. Similarly, these stages or sequences within the same procedure may illustrate the subject's technical level, as well as the execution errors, constituting a real reference point for the examiner (Larionescu, 2012).

Thus, technically speaking, the most important issue is to eliminate errors, their causes being complex and varied. They may be differentiated according to the action sequences, being all caused by the subject(s) generating the errors.

The most important moment in executing the two-handed takeover from below from attack or service is the movement when the ball meets the hands and the post-hit follow-up. The requirements for these are: high availability, extended arms with the formation of a plane surface, advancement towards the ball, and hit amortization. At the same time, the place of contact is of utmost importance, most
