

the taste of a soap bubble — even if it gets a bit muted over time — and imagine something as though you'd been a butterfly and it was to imagine what that would be like with nothing left, nothing there to touch anything else. The question comes: does the building still have a sound? To a lot of architects, I think each one needs a kind of love. They have spaces that aren't caused by forces. For the sake of what they are. Maybe it's the wall or something, but you only really feel there's something over there when you enter a space that's unadorned. For me, I find it a beautiful thing when you're making a building and you imagine the building in that silence. I mean being to make something a quiet place. That's really difficult because, because our world has become so noisy, that we're stuck being generous. But I love some places that are much quieter and you have to go in some lengths to make quiet rooms and imagine the sound they make with all their proportions and materials in a stillness of their own. I mean the sound I am making most comes out of a room — but isn't it more simple than that, and more quiet than that? How does it really sound, when we walk through it? When we speak, when we talk to each other — what will
