

Application of more sophisticated pattern recognition techniques to difficult automatic inspection problems—IC chips, for example—is now technologically feasible.

Pattern Recognition for Automatic Visual Inspection

King-san Fu, Purdue University

The many methods proposed for designing a pattern recognition system can be grouped into three major categories: the template matching approach,¹ the decision-theoretic or discriminant approach,²⁻¹⁰ and the syntactic and structural approach.¹¹⁻¹³ From a more general viewpoint, these approaches can be discussed in terms of pattern representation and decision making (see Figure 1). Primarily, the pattern representation subproblem involves selection of the representation, and the decision-making subproblem involves selection of a decision criterion or similarity measure. Other approaches include problem-solving models,¹⁴ category theory,¹⁵ and relation theory.¹⁶

Template matching. In the template-matching approach, a set of templates or prototypes, one for each pattern class, is stored in the machine. The input pattern is matched or compared with the template of each class, and the classification is based on a preselected matching criterion or similarity measure (e.g., correlation). In other words, if the input pattern matches the template of the *i*th pattern class better than it matches any other template, then the input pattern is classified as being from the *i*th pattern class. For machine simplicity, input patterns and the templates are usually represented in their raw data form, and the decision-making process simply matches the unknown input to each template.

The template-matching approach has been used in printed-character recognizers and bank check readers. The main difficulties with this approach lie in selecting a good template for each pattern class and in defining an appropriate matching criterion, especially when large variations and distortions are expected in the patterns under study. Recently, the use of flexible template-matching or "rubber mask" techniques has been proposed.¹⁷

Decision theoretic. In the decision-theoretic approach, a pattern is represented by a set of N features or an N-dimensional feature vector, and the decision-making process is based on a similarity measure, which, in turn, is expressed in terms of a distance measure or a discriminant function. Statistical and fuzzy-set methods have been proposed¹⁸ for considering noise and distortions. The characterization of each pattern class could be in terms of an N-dimensional class-conditional probability density function or a fuzzy set, and the classification (decision making) of patterns could then be based on a (parametric or nonparametric) statistical decision rule or (fuzzy) membership function. A block diagram of a decision-theoretic pattern recognition system is given in Figure 2.

The template-matching approach could be regarded as a special case of the decision-theoretic approach. In such a case, each pattern is represented by a feature vector, and the decision-making process is based on a simple similarity criterion like correlation.

Applications of decision-theoretic pattern recognition include character recognition, biomedical data analysis and diagnostic decision making, remote sensing, target detection and identification, failure analysis and diagnosis of engineering systems, machine parts recognition and inspection in the automation of manufacturing processes, processing of seismic waves, modeling of socio-economic systems, and classification of ancient objects in archaeology.¹⁹

Structural/syntactic. In the structural and syntactic approach, a pattern is often represented as a string, a tree, or a graph of pattern primitives and their relations. The decision-making process is, in general, a syntax analysis or parsing procedure. Special cases include the use of similarity (or distance) measures between two strings,
