<sup>c</sup>Leakage classes anticipate about 0.82 joints per meter of duct. For systems with a high fitting-to-straight-duct ratio, greater leakage occurs in both sealed and unsealed conditions.

standards are covered by U.L. Standards 181 and 181B and AHC (2003). Soldered or welded duct construction is necessary where sealants are not suitable. Sealants used on exterior ducts must be resistant to weather, temperature cycles, sunlight, and ozone.

Shaft and compartment pressure changes affect duct leakage and are important to health and safety in the design and operation of containment and smoke control systems. Shafts should not be used for supply, return, and/or exhaust air without accounting for their leakage rates. Airflow around buildings, building component leakage, and the distribution of inside and outside pressures over the height of a building, including shafts, are discussed in Chapters 16 and 24.

System Component Design Velocities

Table 8 summarizes face velocities for HVAC components in built-up systems. In most cases, the values are abstracted from pertinent chapters in the 2008 ASHRAE Handbook—HVAC Systems and Equipment; final selection of components should be based on data in these chapters or, preferably, from manufacturers.

Use Figure 14 for preliminary sizing of air intake and exhaust louvers. For air quantities greater than 3300 L/s per louver, the air intake gross louver openings are based on 2 m/s; for exhaust louvers, 2.5 m/s is used for air quantities of 2400 L/s per louver and greater. For smaller air quantities, refer to Figure 14. These criteria are presented on a per-louver basis (i.e., each louver in a bank of louvers) to include each louver frame. Representative production-run louvers were used in establishing Figure 14, and all data used were based on AMCA Standard 500-L tests. For louvers larger than
