Processing personal data under Art. 6.1.f GDPR Mario Egbe Mpame, 2019-08-08 Essay from the year 2019 in the subject Law Data protection grade N A language English abstract The goal of this article as stipulated by its title is to bring this complex notion to the understanding of every privacy stakeholder The protection of personal data has been a major preoccupation of the European legislators in recent years Apart from data protection being a fundamental Human Right it is worth noting that almost all the other fundamental Human Rights rely on personal data For instance if a person s personal data such as name address bank details and location falls into wrong hands as a result inappropriate data protection policies the damages may range from financial losses to bodily harm thus affecting the individual s right to property life et cetera It is for these reasons that the General Data Protection Regulation lays down conditions under which personal data must be processed grants a list of rights to data subjects and fixes very heavy fines that await defaulters Among the lawful grounds for processing personal data is the legitimate interest pursued by the controller This ground is mostly used by online marketing companies Considering that the GDPR gives no clear definition of legitimate interest this article provides a clear understanding of such interest the circumstances under which it may arise as well as a balancing exercise and guiding factors that would help in understanding whether the legitimate interest pursued by the controller actually overrides the fundamental rights and freedoms of the data subject a precondition for processing personal data under such grounds
