ABSTRACT: The technique of In Situ Leach (ISL) uranium mining is well established in the USA, as well as being used extensively in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union. The method is being proposed and tested on uranium deposits in Australia, with sulphuric acid chemistry and no restoration of groundwater following mining. The history and problems of acid ISL sites in the USA and Australia is presented.

1 BACKGROUND

The unconventional mining technique of In Situ Leach (ISL) is now the primary producer of refined uranium in the United States, with a market share of around 95% in the mid 1990's (DoE, 1999). ISL mines appear set to assume a greater role in Australia's uranium industry.

It is perhaps an historical curiosity as to where the conceptual processes for ISL (as applied to uranium) were first conceived and applied. The Chinese were apparently the first to use solution mining to produce copper as early as 907 AD, with references to the technology dating back to 177 BC (Morris, 1984). In the 1890's, the Frasch process for mining elemental sulphur was invented, and ISL mining of gold was first suggested by Russians (Morris, 1984). The first trials of uranium ISL were developed in the USA and Soviet Union in the early 1960's. It is uncertain who developed the concepts or if they were developed separately (Mudd, 1998).

By the mid 1970's, there were ISL mines across the world as an alternative, low cost method (Mudd, 1998). In the USA, ISL mines generally used alkaline chemistry with only a few sites trialling acid chemistry. In contrast, Soviet mines generally used acid with only a few sites using alkaline reagents. In Australia in the 1980's, two ISL projects in South Australia proposed acid, while a third in Western Australia trialled alkaline chemistry (Mudd, 1998).

The environmental regulation of mining generally requires the restoration of affected groundwater to be returned to its pre-mining quality or use category. In countries controlled by the Soviet block, the need for restoration of contaminated groundwater following mining was ignored during operation, and the problems and magnitude of groundwater contamination now coming to light in the 1990's can only be described as extreme (cf. Mudd, 1998 & 2000).

Indeed, the use of alkaline chemistry in the USA has been partly related to the need to restore affected groundwater and that alkaline mine sites are recognised to be technically easier to restore (Mudd, 1998; Twiston & Peterson, 1981). In direct contrast, Australian mines - historically and currently - proposed not to restore affected groundwater after acid ISL mining.

The resurfacing of the Australian acid ISL uranium mine proposals in 1996 (due to changes in Federal government uranium policy), the lack of acid ISL mines in the USA, the research coming to light through the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and others of the extent of impacts from acid ISL mines in the Soviet block (cf. Mudd, 2000), led to a detailed review of ISL uranium mining by the author, completed in 1998 (Mudd, 1998).
