

ART AS EXPERIENCE: JOHN DEWEY

The central claim of John Dewey's (1859–1952) theory of art is that art should not be conceived as a radically distinct aspect of human life. Too many theories of art fail, he insists, just because they treat art as a fundamentally different kind of human endeavor. Although admittedly endowing certain features of these endeavors with a special prominence, art must nonetheless be seen as continuous with more prosaic forms of human activity. Thus, the very features often cited as those that distinguish art from other spheres of human life—such as form and rhythm—are, according to Dewey, found throughout our ordinary experience. Dewey's view of art thus puts him at odds with such diverse theorists as Kant (Chapter 4), Bell (Chapter 10), and Collingwood (Chapter 11).

But if art is continuous with the rest of what we do, according to Dewey, wherein lies its distinctiveness? Dewey's answer is that art results when the desire to create an object whose perceptible properties will yield immediate satisfaction controls the process of its production. Although we may be pleased with the products of many different kinds of activities, only art making is guided by the aim of producing just such pleasure.

An important feature of this definition is that it unites various aspects of art often treated as distinct. For example, both artist and audience play equally important roles in this definition. An art object must be produced by an artist in anticipation of the satisfaction her audience will receive. Similarly, the artistic and the aesthetic refer, for Dewey, to two aspects of the same process, which he sometimes calls "aesthetic artistic" to indicate that neither of the two terms is primary. For him, "artistic" refers to the physical object, whereas "aesthetic" refers to the way in which it is experienced. Art, to be art, must be both artistic and aesthetic, have both an objective and a subjective side. There is, for Dewey, no art that is not aesthetic.

But what "aesthetic" means for Dewey is not what it often means for other theorists of art, for he holds that any experience can have an aesthetic dimension—as is, for example, the satisfaction a mathematician experiences in constructing a proof or a cobbler does in finishing a shoe. It is this sense of conscious completion that Dewey refers to as the aesthetic component of experience and that he sees as attainable in all realms of human endeavor. What is

No single factor determined the growth of this book It may have been that as a novice researcher in Behavioral Psychology I experienced growing discontent with the direction of intellectual activity in which the accent was on methodology and measurement with a distinct atmosphere of dogmatism insecurity and defensiveness The anathema of tender mindedness was attached to any study of mental manifestations that avoided laboratory confirmation and statistical significance Man in his uniqueness and unpredictable potentialities remained unexplored Yet outside the systematic vivisection of variables and their measurement men of originality and genius were studying the mind in its complex yet natural interaction of aspirations values and creative capacities It was almost too easy for me to turn to them for the re-orientation of my psychological interest and it was not difficult to find in Freud the most daring and penetrating representant of humanistic psychology Furthermore it could have been the fact that Freud's thoughts on creative processes appeared to me at once starkly original and yet incomplete and fragmentary that led me to reconsider and expand on them Freud's fascination with culture and creativity although frank and serious led him to a peculiar indecisiveness and overcautiousness which was radically different from the dramatic boldness of his therapeutic methods and the depth of his personality theories

Nature Prose seeks to explain the popularity and appeal of contemporary writing about nature This book intervenes in key areas of contemporary debate about literature and the environment and explores the enduring appeal of writing about nature during an ecological crisis Using a range of international examples with a focus on late twentieth and early twenty first century writing from Britain and the US Dominic Head argues that nature writing contains formal effects which encapsulate our current ecological dilemma and offer a fresh resource for critical thinking The environmental crisis has injected a fresh urgency into nature writing along with a new piquancy for those readers seeking solace in the nonhuman or for those looking to change their habits in the face of ecological catastrophe However behind this apparently strong match between the aims of nature writers and the desires of their readers there is also a shared mood of radical uncertainty and insecurity The treatment and construction of nature in contemporary imaginative prose reveals some significant paradoxes beneath its dominant moods moods which are usually earnest sometimes celebratory sometimes prophetic or cautionary It is in these paradoxical moments that the contemporary ecological crisis is formally encoded in a progressive development of ecological consciousness from the late 1950s onwards Nature prose fiction and nonfiction is now contemporaneous with a defining time of crisis while also being formally fashioned by that context This is a mode of writing that emerges in a world in crisis but which is also in some ways in crisis itself With chapters on remoteness exclusivity abundance and rarity this book marks a turning point in how literary criticism engages with nature writing
