INTRODUCTION

One of the greatest transitions during the history of plants was the evolution of adaptations to life on land. This transition led to a major radiation of plants on Earth. The Tracheophyta or vascular plants are particularly well adapted to a terrestrial life. All tracheophytes share a number of apomorphies, including: 1) an independent, dominant sporophyte; 2) vascular tissue, which includes specialized conductive tissues such as water conducting xylem (tracheary element cells) and sugar conducting phloem (sieve element cells); 3) roots; and 4) a shoot system with sporophytic leaves. All of these were discussed in the previous lab. In general, vascular plants can be separated into the seedless plants (comprising a paraphyletic group) and the seed plants, Spermatophyta (Figure 5.1). Before investigating the apomorphies of Spermatophyta, we will explore the diversity of the seedless tracheophytes.
