When an influence line is to be obtained by following the unit movement of the load across all structural members, the various sections reached by the load, the length and weight must always be equal to one for the load to remain in equilibrium on the entire span. In some cases, your influence diagrams may differ from the influence coefficients of influence which are the values obtained when the unit load is moving over the entire length of the span.

In some cases, you may have to use a unit load of one for convenience, and then you will get the influence of a unit load across the entire span. In some cases, you may have to use a unit load of one for convenience, and then you will get the influence of a unit load across the entire span.
