In a population with a low growth rate, the number of individuals increases slowly. This leads to a lower probability of finding a partner for reproduction.

Population growth affects the genetic diversity of a population. In a population with a high growth rate, the genetic diversity is high. This is because there are many individuals, and each individual has a unique set of genes. In a population with a low growth rate, the genetic diversity is low. This is because there are fewer individuals, and they are more likely to be related to each other.
