

CompTIA® Security+™ Certification

Exam SY0-301

- A Security zones
Areas that are created for using firewalls and routers on the network's edge. Security zones, which include DMZs, extranets, and intranets, permit secure communications between an organization and third parties.
- B DMZ
An area that a company sets aside for Web, FTP, and DNS servers accessible to the public. The DMZ is also a typical location or activity for placing a RADIUS server, providing a single point of access for the external router. If an attacker gains access to the RADIUS server, he or she could gain access to the internal network without being authenticated to the external router.
- C Firewall
A device that isolates one network from another. Its main function is to prevent an external network from having unauthorized access to an internal, public network. The firewall can be a dedicated physical device or a software feature coded by a router, switch, or similar device.
- D Router
A network management device that sits between different network segments and routes traffic from one network to another. When packet filtering is coded to a router's functionality, the router can take on the additional role of digital traffic cop.
- E Bastion host
A computer that resides in a DMZ and hosts Web, mail, DNS, and/or FTP servers. To increase security, you should restrict all unnecessary programs, services, and protocols and disable all unnecessary network ports on the bastion host.
- F Remote network access server
A server that provides remote authentication services for clients who are using dial-in, VPN, or access point connections. This can be a RADIUS or TACACS+ server.
