Abstract

The result of a study in the area of Concurrent Engineering in Mexican Companies is presented in this paper. This study identified the following major issues: the need to train/educate engineers in CE and to support design process automation, the lack of standardized product definitions and design for manufacture rules, and the necessity to introduce social-technical design concepts and cooperative design methods. From the 12 companies analyzed, two were selected to reengineer their design process in order to improve their product development processes. The process and information collected was used to develop two Computer Aided Engineering Systems to support Concurrent Engineering: Concurrent Design System for Automotive Part Dies and Integrated Development Environment of Glass Products.
