

The right to refuse unsafe work

For employers and supervisors:

The information in this guide is provided to help you deliver information to workers in a toolbox meeting, staff safety meeting, or similar workplace setting.

As you present this information, think about ways you can include details that are specific to your workplace. For example, talk about:

- Processes you have in place for workers to report potentially unsafe conditions — before needing to use the right to refuse procedure
- Names and contact information for worker representatives or union representatives
- Any relevant examples of work tasks that have been refused as unsafe in the past, and how those issues were resolved

Use the space on the third page of this meeting guide to record these details.

As a worker, you have rights related to a healthy and safe workplace. You have the right to know about hazards in the workplace and the right to participate in health and safety activities. You also have the right to refuse unsafe work.

If your supervisor or employer asks you to perform a work process or use a tool or equipment, and you have a good reason to believe that doing the work might create an undue hazard to your own health and safety or the health and safety of any person, you must refuse this work. This is both your right and your responsibility.

Before you exercise your right to refuse, be sure you have followed other procedures for reporting hazards and resolving workplace problems, such as talking to your supervisor. If those other hazard reporting processes have not resolved the problems and you still believe that the work presents an undue hazard, exercise your right to refuse.
