Reading: First impressions

1 Discuss these questions.

- Some psychologists say that it takes people 20 seconds to form a first impression. Do you agree? How long does it take you?
- People who have to speak in front of an audience generally try to make a good first impression. How do they do it?

2 Read the magazine article below. Do you agree with what the author says about presentations? Why?/Why not?

3 Find an example of each of the following in the article.

- the present simple
- the past simple
- the present perfect
- the past perfect
- a future form

Looking for maximum impact

As the saying goes, you never get a second chance to make a first impression.

Have you ever wondered why first impressions are so important? According to communication experts, their importance can be explained by the fact that people not only hold on to them, but also seek to reinforce them. In other words, when you make a great first impression, people keep looking for the good points in you. On the other hand, if you mess up, you have to work really hard afterwards to project a positive image.

A few years ago, I attended an international conference and was struck by how most presenters started their talk. All of them had already been introduced; most of them had a slide behind them with the title of their talk, their name and affiliation. Everyone in the audience had received a programme with the same information and an abstract of the talk. Yet, how did the talk start? 'Good afternoon. My name is John Smith and I work for Waits Academy. My presentation today is about ...' How could you be more uninspiring?

No wonder that the workshop I remember best is the one where the presenter adopted a radically different approach. Her very first words were: 'Where do people learn languages?' Complete silence in the audience. After a few seconds, she then replied: 'Between their ears.' She had us. We all thought it was a brilliant opener, we all expected the talk to get even better, and it did.

So, next time you're going to give a presentation, make an important phone call or write an email, ask yourself these two questions: 'How am I going to command attention? How am I going to enter the other person's world?'
