SHARK WHISPERER

Stuart Cove takes Adam Higginbotham under the waves to meet his killer cast.

Stuart Cove sleeps on the family vessel. One hand rests on a plastic crate lined with chopped fish. When he opens the crate to spoil the last divers' barrage, 30 reef sharks appear in the water around us. Twenty minutes later all the chopped fish has gone and the sharks drift away. Over the past 25 years, Stuart has captured and manipulated sharks into various live scenes – especially tiger sharks. Tiger sharks are big and aggressive and frequently responsible for attacking humans, but when captured or cajoled under stress they struggle, and then become calm as if they are half asleep. The sharks can then be whipped and manipulated for the shot and this is when Stuart steps in.

Stuart's work includes three James Bond films, one Jaws sequel and even a TV advert for a Japanese toothpaste which involved getting a shark to hold still underwater while he scrubbed its teeth with a 3ft pink toothbrush. But the film that made Stuart famous is Open Water (2004). Filmed on a shoestring budget on a second-hand digital video camera, it was about a young couple, left behind in the open ocean after a diving boat trip and then menaced by sharks. What made the film remarkable was that it didn't use any staged-in-a-tank or special effects. "It's all of it wasn't acting. It was real fear. It should have been in an Oscar," says Cove. "But the budget was too small to do that."

Cove grew up in the Bahamas. At 19, he was an experienced diver, but he had no idea, when he started working on the James Bond film For Your Eyes Only, that he would have to work with tiger sharks. "One day they said to us, 'OK, we are going to release the shark. If the shark comes to you, jump on its back.' Then they said 'Stuart, you're one of the guys.' And I thought, 'Are you out of your mind?' But then they said, 'You'll get $100.' And, well ... as a teenager in 1979, that's a pile of money." Today, Cove charges thousands for two to three days shooting with a tiger shark.

"Honestly, I was so afraid to touch," Cove says. During the first take, the shark snapped – much to Cove's relief. Impressed by how the sea animal, he was amazed to find it struggling at the edge of the net, trapped in a net. "So I grabbed it and it tried to bite me, and then it relaxed. I swam it back and suddenly I saw the head who owned the whole boat swimming." After that, Cove became one of the chief shark handlers. "I've never told any one but I found the shark in the net."

Out at the dive site, I asked him what I should do if I'm actually attacked by one of the sharks he's handling. "Try tapping your shark on," he said, "and avoid shooting." But to live up to their reputation, many species of shark are very hard to control. Cove has seen sharks take bait such as the horn of rhinoceros, taste it then spit it out. Some goes for diving, when the sharks accidentally bite the leaders' hands, the animals immediately realise their mistake when they taste a wetsuit.

Despite that, Cove himself has been bitten a few times by sharks. Once he was bitten on the hand. "It was the worst pain I've ever felt," he said. "The teeth go very deep." Still, he recalled that each time he had been doing all the things he warns you should not be wearing his hands around in the water unprotected.

For some shoots Cove and his staff have even simulated shark attacks. They strap food between a chain-mail suit and their clothing and let sharks tear it off them. "That's dangerous because they can actually rip your wetsuit and flesh ... yeah, it's not smart. But you know," he says, "for fame and fortune you don't mind doing anything."
