Abstract:- Soil erosion is one of the most serious environment degradation problem. However reliable measurement of erosion remains limited and estimates of soil productivity are even rarer. Nevertheless, identification and assessment of erosion problems could have an important role in influencing better land use and conservation practices. Rainfall simulators are considered as effective aids in soil conservation research. Simulators make it possible to produce predetermined storms at any desired time and location. Laterite soils are by far the most important soil group occurring in Kerala and cover the largest area. The objective of this study was to estimate soil loss and runoff of laterite soil at different land slopes under simulated rainfall conditions. The soil loss and runoff increased with increase in the rainfall intensity for different slopes studied.

Keywords:- Soil erosion, rainfall simulators, soil loss, runoff

I. INTRODUCTION

Soil erosion is a two phase process consisting of the detachment of individual particles from soil mass and their transport by erosive agents such as running water and wind [3]. When sufficient energy is no longer available to transport the particles, a third phase (deposition) occurs.

The amount of erosion from raindrops has been linked to the rainfall characteristics such as the rainfall intensity, drop diameter, impact velocity and rainfall kinetic energy. The size, distribution and shape of rain drops influence the energy, amount and erosivity of rainstorm. Median drop size increases with the increase in the rainfall intensity [1].

Rainfall simulators have been used to accelerate research in soil erosion and runoff from agricultural lands, high ways etc. Simulated rainfall as water applied in a form similar to natural rainfall [2].

The limitations of these types of rainfall simulators are that continuous jets of rain hit the soil at particular points below the drop former, which may not happen in nature and close spacing of drop formers adopted for getting a better uniformity resulted in high rainfall intensities than desired [6].

Researchers studying runoff and soil loss from rainfall have recognized the desirability of using rainfall simulators to supplement and expedite their investigations. The use of a rainfall simulator enables nearly immediate evaluation of carefully controlled plot conditions as well as observations of the erosion process involved. Basic characters of a natural rain storm which are required to be simulated in a laboratory are rainfall intensity, uniformity of distribution of raindrops, drop size and rainfall velocity approaching the terminal velocity of the natural rainfall.

II. MATERIALS AND METHODS

Micro soil loss plots were established to study the rill erosion process. The soil is reddish brown and belongs to the textural class of sandy clay loam. The experimental set up consisted of three unit's viz., the runoff plot, the rainfall simulator and the runoff-sediment collection unit. Two runoff plots, one on flat land and other on land with a slope of 3 per cent and each with a size of 3.5x2.5 m were prepared. The rainfall simulator designed and fabricated could apply the desired rainfall over the runoff plot. The runoff containing the sediments was collected at the outlet for analysis. The designed rate of water was applied over the runoff plot using the rainfall simulator.

Design and fabrication of rainfall simulator

A rainfall of desired intensity was produced by using microsprinklers of maximum discharge capacity of 160 litre per hour with a wetted circle diameter of 3 m. A framework was fabricated to support the sprinkler heads with the dimension of 3.5 m x 2.5 m using aluminium pipe of diameter 1.91cm [5]. The pipes were joined at the corners using an elbow. The frame work was supported by legs of height 1m at the four corners. A 4 cm long GI pipe was welded to the elbow and the legs were connected to it. Two transverse pipes were joined to the frame using a T- joint made of GI pipe.
