Diffusion Through a Membrane

A Laboratory Activity for the Living Environment

Diffusion is an important living process. It allows the cells of an organism to obtain the substances they need to survive. It also allows the cells to get rid of the wastes they produce. In a laboratory activity, you will observe diffusion through a membrane. You will see that a substance moves from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration. Diffusion continues until the substances are evenly distributed. This is called equilibrium. You will see that equilibrium has been reached because there is no net change in the concentration of the substances.

When a substance moves from one area to another, it is called diffusion. In this activity, you will see that a substance moves from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration. This is called diffusion. Diffusion continues until the substances are evenly distributed. This is called equilibrium.

Living cells are surrounded by a membrane that is made of phospholipids. Phospholipids are made of two parts: a hydrophilic head and a hydrophobic tail. The hydrophilic head is attracted to water, and the hydrophobic tail is repelled by water. This makes the membrane a barrier to the movement of water-soluble substances. Some substances can pass through the membrane, but others cannot. The permeability of the membrane can change. This is called osmosis. Osmosis is the movement of water through a membrane from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration.

Now you will see how diffusion works. You will see that a substance moves from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration. This is called diffusion. Diffusion continues until the substances are evenly distributed. This is called equilibrium. You will see that equilibrium has been reached because there is no net change in the concentration of the substances.

Objectives

- 1. To observe the process of diffusion through a membrane.
- 2. To understand how a cell gets the substances it needs to survive and how it gets rid of its wastes.
- 3. To understand the process of osmosis through a membrane.
- 4. To understand the process of equilibrium through a membrane.

Before you begin, think about what you will see. You will see that a substance moves from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration. This is called diffusion. Diffusion continues until the substances are evenly distributed. This is called equilibrium. You will see that equilibrium has been reached because there is no net change in the concentration of the substances.
