Abstract: Procrastination behaviors become more and more common among the college student population. Procrastination behaviors include being late to class, not completing tasks assigned by teachers on time, not having a clear study time plan, or making a hasty last-minute effort. The reason for procrastination is to some extent due to less supervision by teachers and parents. Therefore, research on academic procrastination among college students and on effective interventions to correct this undesirable behavior is currently the focus of educational studies. Based on this phenomenon, this paper conducted a questionnaire survey and an in-depth interview to investigate the local undergraduate university, Qingdao Agricultural University, as an example. This paper investigated the differences in study procrastination behavior among gender and grade levels and the influence of study procrastination behavior on college students' academic performance. The findings revealed that there was no discernible variation in the study procrastination behaviors of college students in local undergraduate institutions in terms of gender. According to grade level, the third year of college had the greatest level of procrastination, and the fourth year of college had the lowest level, according to grade level. In addition, there was a good correlation existed between academic procrastination behavior and academic performance. The primary causes for procrastination were students' lack of interest in the task itself and their poor self-control. In all, this study provides preliminary evidence for future educational practices targeting procrastination.

Keywords: procrastination behavior, academic performance, questionnaire survey, in-depth interview

1. Introduction

College students are an important talent resource reserve and are closely related to the future development of China. Nowadays, many scholars have conducted in-depth investigations into the causes, effects, and solutions of learning procrastination behaviors.

College students are currently in the transition stage from school to society. Many factors from the outside world can tempt them, leading to resistance and pessimism about academic tasks, which seriously affects the physical and mental health of individuals [1,2].
