Abstract: Housing and its indoor environment influence its inhabitants' comfort, productivity, and health. For this reason, it is becoming increasingly important to investigate the factors that affect indoor environmental quality. Thus, numerous sustainability assessment systems have been developed to evaluate building performance. This paper presents a model for evaluating the indoor environment of housing located in the Biobío region of Chile, integrating aspects that influence its overall quality. The research methodology proposes a strategy to identify appropriate evaluation criteria and contextualized standards. The application of the model made it possible to identify the level of performance of studio dwellings for each category, namely air quality, thermal comfort, acoustics, and lighting, as well as the overall evaluation of the IEQ. The results reflect that the lowest levels of performance in the three houses were with respect to the acoustic evaluation criteria, while the highest levels of performance were for the air quality evaluation criteria.

Keywords: indoor environmental quality; building sustainability assessment systems; weighted IEQ assessment scales

1. Introduction

Reaching sustainable development has been one of the largest concerns in the last decade, attracting academics' and professionals' work worldwide. Sustainable development is the balanced performance of social, environmental, and economic dimensions of human life for the benefit of present and future generations [1]. Therefore, the responsible management of a healthy built environment by the efficient use of ecological principles and resources has become fundamental for human impact on the environment and citizens' quality of life [2]. However, rising constantly are the construction industry's impacts over the environment, society, and economy [3], as it is an industry with high consumption of energy and natural resources and is a source of environmental pollution [4].

To face this problem, Building Sustainability Assessment (BSA) systems have been developed in order to certify the reduction of the environmental impact generated by buildings [5]. Since the appearance of the first BSA system, BREEAM certification, in 1990 and the later arrival of new international systems, it has been proven that buildings have progressed towards sustainability, introducing changes in the conventional constructive processes, improving the environmental performance, and offering a lower cost of operation with higher quality of internal environment for its inhabitants [6,7].

Whilst there are various BSA systems worldwide with different approaches, some authors have pointed that only certain systems have been able to excel due their influence worldwide [8,9], which are characterized for targeting three basic categories: materials, energy, and interior environmental quality (IEQ) [10]. Thus, IEQ assessment has become an important concern for sustainable development, so much so that health and social well-being depend on its quality [11,12]. Table 1 presents the BSA systems focused on residential use and their evaluation criteria.
