

An Overview of Politeness Theories: Current Status, Future Orientations

Molse n Shahrokhi*, Farinaz Shirani Bidabadi

Department of English, Shahreza Branch, Islamic Azad University, Shahreza, Isfahan, Iran

Abstract This paper is an endeavour to depict a holistic image of theories of politeness ranging from classic theories of politeness to the most up-to-date theories. To this end, the reviews of the social norm view, the conversational maxim view, the conversational-contract view, Brown and Levinson's face-saving view, Arndt and Jannay's Supportive face-work and interpersonal politeness, Spencer-Oatey's view of rapport management, Ide's notion of discernment and volition, Scollon and Scollon's intercultural communication, and Watt's politeness view are provided and the main tenets of every theory are explained critically. The explanation of the current status of theories of politeness would be followed by conclusions that provide some orientations for future studies conducted on politeness.

1. Origins of Politeness

As a socialization process competent adult members in every society learn how to behave politely, linguistically and otherwise. Hence, politeness has not been born as an instinctive mankind property, but it is a phenomenon which has been constructed through sociocultural and historical processes.

Historically, traces of the English term 'polite' can be found in the 15th century. Etymologically, however, it derives from late Medieval Latin politus meaning 'smoothed and accomplished'. The term 'polite' was synonymous with concepts such as 'refined', 'polished' when people were concerned. In the seventeenth century a polite person was defined as 'one of refined courteous manners', according to the oxford dictionary of etymology.

[14] believes that in French, Spanish, German, and Dutch courtesy values such as "loyalty" and "reciprocal trust" were used by upper class people in the Middle Ages to distinguish themselves from the rest of people. According to [14] the primary purposes behind following courtesy values were achieving success, winning honors and behaving appropriately at court.

In Persian, adab (politeness) is defined as the knowledge by which man can avoid any fault in speech, according to Dehkhoda dictionary (1980). Jorjani, however, extends the realm of politeness to the knowledge of any affair through which man is able to abstain from any kind of fault which would result in a peaceful and brotherly relationship among people.

[15] states that during renaissance period not only upper class people but also the rest of people were concerned with the amelioration of social manners and social tact as well as a civilized society. The consideration that a person owes to another one was of great importance to maintain and balance social relation; moreover the reciprocal obligations and duties among people of all walks of life needed to be determined.

2. Politeness: Preliminary Remarks

Developing theories of politeness or investigating norms of politeness in different cultures as well as presenting the definition of politeness have been the focus of attention by most studies on politeness [5, 28, 17, 7, 55, 57].

The status quo in politeness studies reveals "numerous definitions of politeness" [57] that indicates "varied conceptualizations of politeness". Several factors have given rise to the current states of affairs among which [57] calls the lack of a clearly differentiation and a thoroughly examination of the relationship between commonsense and scientific notions of politeness as one of the important factors. [55] uses the term "first-order politeness" and "second-order politeness" to clarify the commonsense and scientific notions of politeness. They state that:

First-order politeness corresponds to the various ways in which polite behavior is perceived and talked about by members of socio-cultural groups. It encompasses ... commonsense notions of politeness. Second-order politeness, on the other hand, is a theoretical construct, a term within a theory of social behavior and language usage [55].
