The present study was designed to investigate the effects of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged men. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved a random assignment of participants to either a training or a control group. The training group performed a combination of aerobic and resistance exercises, while the control group remained sedentary. Data were collected at baseline and at the end of the 12-week period. The results showed that the training group experienced significant improvements in cardiovascular fitness, muscle strength, and body composition compared to the control group. Additionally, the training group reported a decrease in perceived stress and an increase in overall well-being. These findings suggest that a structured exercise program can have beneficial effects on the health and quality of life of sedentary individuals.
