Abstract

Multi-object tracking is a fundamental computer vision task with a wide variety of real-life applications ranging from surveillance and monitoring to biomedical video analysis. Multi-object tracking is a challenging task due to complications caused by object appearance changes, complex object dynamics, clutter in the environment, and partial or full occlusions. In this paper, we propose a time-efficient detection-based multi-object tracking system using a three-step cascaded data association scheme that combines a fast spatial distance only short-term data association, a robust tracklet linking step using discriminative object appearance models, and an explicit occlusion handling unit relying not only on tracked objects' motion patterns but also on environmental constraints such as presence of potential occluders in the scene. Our experiments on UA-DETRAC multi-object tracking benchmark dataset consisting of challenging real-world traffic videos show promising results against state-of-the-art trackers.

1. Introduction

Visual tracking is a fundamental computer vision task with many applications in various domains from surveillance and monitoring, sport video analysis, robotics, to biomedical motion analysis. Single object tracking [6, 27, 37, 3] and multi-object tracking [36, 2, 22] are the two main categories of visual tracking. Multi-object tracking aims to locate multiple objects in a scene, maintain their identities in time, and form motion trajectories for further analysis. Recent advances in object detection methods [12, 26, 13] started to shift the focus of multi-object tracking studies from object localization to data association and trajectory estimation. Tracking-by-detection methods maintain object identities in time and form motion trajectories relying on data association approaches [25, 10]. The data association process can be performed either online [17, 29] by exploiting only the information gathered from the past frames, or offline (also called batch-mode) [18, 40] by exploiting information from both past and future frames. Some applications (e.g. online surveillance, navigation, autonomous driving etc.) require online object tracking. Temporary detection problems, false positives (spurious detections), false negatives (such as those caused by partial or full occlusions), over/under segmentation (target splits and merges), or data association ambiguities may lead to trajectory fragmentation. In such cases, tracklet linking is needed to generate more complete trajectories.

There are two critical issues with data association for multi-object tracking. First, how to reliably match new detections to the existing trajectories despite sub-optimal detection results and objects entering/exiting the scene. Second, how to reduce the computational cost needed to resolve multiple hypotheses. Appearance [39, 2, 24], motion [23, 38], and environment context [39, 31] are the major cues used to link targets or fragmented tracklets (i.e.
