

INTRODUCTION TO EXPERIMENTAL PSYCHOLOGY

DEFINITION OF PSYCHOLOGY

Psychology is the scientific study of behaviour and mental processes. Behaviour includes all of our outward or overt actions and reactions, such as talking, facial expressions, and movement. The term mental processes refer to all the internal, covert (hidden) activity of our minds, such as thinking, feeling, and remembering (Ciccarelli & White, 2018)

We can define psychology as the scientific study of behaviour and the mind. The term behaviour refers to actions and responses that we can directly observe, whereas the term mind refers to internal states and processes—such as thoughts and feelings—that cannot be seen directly and that must be inferred from observable, measurable responses. (Michael W. Passer, 2009)

Goals of Psychology

As a science, psychology has five central goals:

1. DESCRIPTION

The first step in understanding anything is to describe it. Description involves observing a behaviour and noting everything about it: what is happening, where it happens, to whom it happens, and under what circumstances it seems to happen. For example, a psychologist might wonder why so many computer scientists seem to be male. She makes further observations and notes that many “nontechnies” stereotypically perceive the life and environment of a computer scientist as someone who lives and breathes at the computer and surrounds himself with computer games, junk food, and science-fiction gadgets—characteristics that add up to a very masculine ambience.

2. EXPLANATION

Finding explanations for behavior is a very important step in the process of forming theories of behavior. A theory is a general explanation of a set of observations or facts. The goal of description provides the observations, and the goal of explanation helps build the theory. For example, the psychologist might try to
