GATORADE: THIRSTING FOR COMPETITIVE POSITIONING

According to Larry Dykstra, manager of marketing research for Quaker Oats, the development of a focused positioning for Gatorade has allowed the company to target core users and identify secondary markets. Before Quaker acquired the beverage in 1983, Gatorade's previous owner had promoted it by portraying users as competitive athletes, adult men, teens, and caricatures of athletes.

"When we acquired Gatorade," recalls Dykstra, "it was a poorly positioned brand, with a lack of consistent focus." This position stood in contrast with the way current users were defined. "There was no message on the uses of this product or under which circumstances and occasions it was supposed to be used."

When Quaker looked at marketing research, Dykstra says the company found that Gatorade's main users were men aged 19 – 44, that they understood the product, had a good perception of what it did, and knew when to drink it and how to use it. Since Gatorade had been developed and marketed primarily in the South, Quaker wanted to find out if there was an opportunity to market the drink in other areas. A study of attitudes determined that the target could be expanded geographically. "We felt, based on research, that could take a narrow, solid positioning of the product that is consistent with southern users and market the product in the North," Dykstra says. Gatorade was positioned for physical activity enthusiasts as a drink to quench their thirst and replenish minerals lost during exercise better than other beverages did. Subsequent advertising in 1984 centred around these attributes.

In 1985, the company moved away from this core positioning by trying to joke about the product's competitive heritage – a strategy that failed. [TV ads showed people in different activity situations trying to make sports jokes.] A decision was made to go back to narrow positioning in 1986.

"In 1987, we focused in our primary target, but there have been refinements," Dykstra explains. "We've tried to portray users as accomplished but not professional athletes." Although the drink is perceived as a "serious beverage, the ads have added a fun component by showing people enjoying it together. We tried to show people who did'nt alienate customers, but also people they could aspire to be like."

An effort also was made to portray people's motivations for using the product. A computer graphic that portrays thirst quenching was introduced—one which, according to Dykstra, came "across so strong we've started to change the language."

But being well-focused and consistent in developing the product over time can create other problems. "Because Gatorade is narrowly positioned in terms of users and user occasions," explains Dykstra, growth opportunities are probably limited. So how can we go about identifying new opportunities?"
