weakness also prohibits Okonkwo from making proper amends in this case because “inwardly he was repentant. But he was not the man to go about telling his neighbours that he was in error.” Most notably, fear of being perceived as weak prompts Okonkwo to take part in killing Ikemefuna, the boy he had begun to look on as his own son. The narrator observes, “Dazed with fear, Okonkwo drew his machete and cut him down. He was afraid of being thought weak.”

Okonkwo’s fear of weakness is ultimately responsible for his own downfall and death. While in exile, Okonkwo hears about the incursion of the white missionaries and wonders, “What is it that has happened to our people? Why have they lost the power to fight?” Okonkwo’s strength and warlike spirit cause him to hold his people to a particular standard of conduct, and when they do not meet it, he finally does give in to despair. As the influence of the white men grows stronger, Okonkwo mourns “for the warlike men of Umuofia, who had so unaccountably become soft like women.” Okonkwo sees that the old way of life is falling apart, and it grieves him. When he recognizes that his village will not take up arms against the whites, Okonkwo’s world view is shattered; he kills himself rather than live with weakness and shame.

How do Okonkwo’s relationship with his father, Unoka, and Nwoye’s relationship with Okonkwo affect Okonkwo’s and Nwoye’s personalities and values. Include examples from the novel in your discussion.

Okonkwo’s father Unoka was a laughingstock in the village for his perpetual laziness, lack of success, and reputation as a debtor. Unoka wasted his money on palm-wine when he was young; as an adult, he is poor, and his wife and children don’t have enough to eat. The villagers mock him. Furthermore, although Unoka makes sacrifices to the gods of the land of the yam, he has a reputation for laziness as a farmer, and his crops perpetually fail. The oracle points out that while other men work hard to clear land to plant their fields, Unoka keeps planting in the same exhausted fields year after year, rather than do the work to clear new fields. He dies without taking any titles among his people, and Okonkwo feels deeply ashamed of him.

His father’s failures as a farmer and as a man have a profound impact on Okonkwo’s character as an adult. Okonkwo develops a tremendous capacity for hard work and feels driven to succeed; he prefers to work in his fields above all else. During the Feast of the New Yam, rather than waiting to harvest his crop as the festival demands, Okonkwo’s frustration and impatience build until he lashes out at his family. As a result of his fear of appearing weak and lazy like his father, Okonkwo will not tolerate idleness and shows little gentleness to his family. He regards his wives and children as lazy because they lack the physical strength to keep up with him on the farm, so he often beats them. He also “had no patience with unsuccessful men” among his clan, a trait that sometimes brings censure from the leaders of the tribe. Most of all, Okonkwo fears appearing weak in front of the tribal leaders. This fear causes tremendous sorrow and hardship for Okonkwo, provoking him to take part in killing Ikemefuna, a boy whom he had come to love and respect, simply because “[Okonkwo] was afraid of being thought
