ABSTRACT

Teaching English as a Second Language (ESL) to learners of different basic schooling phases is arguably an interesting yet enigmatic phenomenon, which features a variety of factors such as language diversity, curriculum, policy, and cultural factors. This paper sought to explore the experiences and the strategies employed by ESL teachers to aid learners navigate through linguistic diversity in English Second Language classroom contexts. From the interpretivist epistemological stance, the researchers inferred qualitative data through semi-structured interviews from ten (10) purposively sampled high school ESL teachers from one district in Durban. Data was thematically analysed through the Social Constructivist Theory. The study's findings indicated that the primary approach used by ESL teachers in linguistically diverse classrooms was various languages in English literature classrooms. Furthermore, the study discovered that using various languages arouses learners' interests and enhances learner involvement in classroom-based activities. In this regard, the researchers concluded that learners are more engaged and motivated to learn to read, analyse and respond to texts in a multilingual classroom than in monolingual classrooms. The researchers further recommend that teachers use strategies beyond the textbook and policy documents to capture the learner's attention. Using various teaching approaches, codeswitching, and translanguaging are effective strategies teachers and the Department of Education should not shy away from.

INTRODUCTION

South Africa is a linguistically and culturally diverse country with twelve official languages. This language diversity has been the epicentre and the principal cause of language contestations since the advent of democracy in South Africa. While the apartheid system is arguably attributed to the language contestations, the role of the South African Schools Acts and other recent political initiations, such as the Use of Official Languages Act of 2012, in subverting the apartheid influence in multi-cultural education and school settings cannot be overlooked. However, the use of one language in the education setting to assist learners and teachers in navigating through the linguistically diverse classroom and school settings has been bedevilling for the past two decades. While Kretzer and Kaschula advocate for the implementation of the Language in Education Policy stipulations in defining and devising a language
