BBQ smoking tips from the pros

We've dug deeper than the average website, to bring you tips you normally only pick up around the campfire. So learn exactly what BBQ champions of the deep south rely on for the perfect flavor. Or how to hot smoke ribs that you'll remember forever. These are the tips you won't find anywhere else. To make 2022 your most smoking summer on the BBQ yet.

1. Don't make the 'bark' too thick

Chef David's approach, of Smokehouse Magazine explains how to create the perfect bark (using an a slow-cooked cut like pork shoulder).

Notice that before your shoulder can take up to 28 hours, you're taking, depending on the size, so don't use an excessive amount of wood or charcoal. If you do, the temperature will rise too quickly, creating a bark that's too thick for further smoke to penetrate the meat with flavor. Do not open the smoking chamber - unless you really have to, as you bring the process and also the temperature and humidity that's already been created. Once the meat has reached 190 or above you can take it out and let it rest for as long as possible. If it's a long but uncomplicated process, it's most definitely a labor of love.

2. Treat charcoal like an ingredient

BBQ and the expert barbecue Taylor shows the ingredient you might have forgotten.

I spend a lot of time talking about choosing the right charcoal. I think people spend a lot of time deciding on what BBQ to buy, and then just buy any old charcoal to grill it. Think of charcoal as an ingredient and spend time choosing it carefully. You wouldn't spend ages choosing great quality meat to then cook it badly, so treat charcoal in the same way. A lot of mass produced charcoal is packed with chemicals which is necessary to support its flammability when it's smoking thousands of briquets, however this then affects the flavor of the food you're cooking on it.

On a very big alternative of people wanting sustainable British charcoal. The art of making charcoal is a very ancient art that evolved in the bronze age. It's very interconnected to woodland management and it's a really positive thing for conservation and biodiversity. Making charcoal is one of the ways that people can make money from woods and therefore being their thinking.

3. The secret to 18hr cooking

The 'Mason' method, developed by American BBQ competition and author, the Mason, is perfect for a long slow smoke (right at the edge of zero, and the BBQ only lasts a few hours. Instead, you will cook into the BBQ and loaded, and arrange in a horizontal shape. Turn or rotate meat strips around the pit's coals. Then pour a small number of lit coals into the gap. The fire will steadily burn through, generating smoke, and keeping the smoker going for 4 to 28 hours. The constant slow burn also helps to keep the heat cooking temperatures more stable.

4. Avoid the BBQ 'stall', using the Texas Crutch

Around 2-4 hours into cooking, depending on joint size, the temperature of your meat stops rising, and can even fall. This is called the BBQ 'stall', and happens as any extra heat is used to evaporating more water from the meat, and there is no increase in internal temperature. The BBQ competition avoid this by wrapping a brisket, pulled pork or the a quantity of aluminum foil when the internal temperature reaches 170 to 175. A little stock like beef or apple juice (the pork can also be added before that) is added. The aluminum wrapped meat parcel is placed back in the BBQ smoker and cooked until it reaches the desired final internal temperature - giving moister meat and shorter cooking times. The Texas origin of the technique - particularly its popularity with brisket - has gone to name the Texas Crutch.

5. Replace water with sand... yes really

The pan is not an whether to get a pan of water at the base of the smoker during cooking. Most BBQ smokers have a water pan that sits above the hot coal bed. The body of water helps to keep the temperature stable during cooking, but some people find it can be difficult to get the smoker up to temperature, and sometimes if you're smoking a little high, it's tough to prevent the water from evaporating straight away. Instead, you can fill the pan with sand (or a large flower pot base, wrapped in aluminum foil), and it will work. Water is also important in keeping a moist environment inside the smoker. For dry, and the smoke molecules won't be able to penetrate the meat, too hot, and the smoke flavors drip off the meat. The meat will form a slightly tacky outer layer - the pellicle - for perfect smoke absorption. Another dry out pit. If you choose humidity or sand over water, then additional moisture needs to be introduced through spraying (see next tip).

6. Spray dem ribs!

Most meals involve during hot smoking - and - if you're not using a water pan, spraying water around the inside of the smoker every 20 minutes to 2 hours helps to keep up the humidity. Some people spray beer, wine, apple juice, or even a mix of apple and soy sauce into the smoking chamber using the type of spray bottle you might use to water house plants) every 20 mins to 2 hours. The apple juice and soy mixture is used to enhance flavor and color. It is also sometimes called the 'sauce' - diluted or 'sprayed' directly onto the meat. However, if you're going to add sauce to the meats after cooking, there won't be much difference in taste. Here at Sous Chef, we just spray water.
