

Mathematical Evidence for Evolution

26

Evolutionary biologists use mathematical models to understand how genetic drift and natural selection affect the genetic composition of populations in nature.

Biologists perform simulations of evolutionary processes in the laboratory. The results of the simulations are compared to the results of the mathematical models to see how well the models describe the results of the simulations.

Mathematical models are used to predict the results of evolutionary processes in nature. The results of the simulations are compared to the results of the mathematical models to see how well the models describe the results of the simulations.

As the population size  $N$  increases:

- the rate of genetic drift decreases as the amount of genetic drift is smaller relative to natural selection and genetic drift.
- the rate of genetic drift increases as the amount of genetic drift is larger relative to natural selection and genetic drift.
- the rate of genetic drift decreases as the amount of genetic drift is smaller relative to natural selection and genetic drift.

Procedure

Part A. Genetic Drift Simulation

• Simulation of genetic drift: The genetic drift simulation is the same as the genetic drift simulation in Figure 15.1 (page 15) except that the population size is 1000. The results of the simulation are compared to the results of the mathematical models to see how well the models describe the results of the simulation.
