Questions 1-30

Due 5/02/16 @ 8:00 PM

1.) What is the difference between accident prevention and safety management?

While both accident prevention and safety management are both key elements to preventing and eliminating accidents, they are two separate parts to the entirety of this process. Accident prevention is considered a somewhat short term, strategic method of controlling all the parts of a job, including workers, materials, tools, and equipment, in order to directly stop accidents from happening. In contrast safety management approaches the prevention of accidents with a more comprehensive, long term method through the develop of safety programs, the planning of work with safety factors considered, the education of employees in safe work practices, and the training of employees in how to identify and prevent accidents.

2.) What are the steps in the accident prevention process?

The accident prevention process is a straight forward sequence of steps that serve to help an analyst fully evaluate potential hazards and then come to the best solution. This sequence of steps can be broken down as follows. →

- Identification of the problem – In this step the analyst clearly defines the problem and puts it in a logical easy to understand form
- Collection of data - This step requires the analyst to record data through observation as well as other means and then organize it into an orderly form.
- Analyzing the data – To complete this step the analyst reviews the data to gain a sense of what direction needs to be pursued in order to find a solution.
- Selection of a remedy – This step involves the analyst choosing the best solution for the problem that will be applied in the next step.
- Implementation of remedy – In this step the analyst proposes and implements the chosen solution on the actual applicable process.
- Monitoring results – After implementing the solution the analyst will then follow up by monitoring the results of the proposed remedy. If the implemented remedy does not solve the problem the analyst will then start this sequence again to see if a better solution can be found.
