

Chapter One (Introduction)

In the introduction, Hoadley presents a conversation from a South African classroom. Through this conversation between the teacher and learners, we see the emphasis on memorisation. Hoadley says, "Pedagogy is a form of marking time, a rite of rote". What does this mean? It means that an aspect is repeated and repeated until it becomes habitual or mechanical. Hoadley questions that some 25 years after significant curriculum reform in South Africa, we still have classrooms like the one in Khayelitsha. Pedagogy, which refers to the method and practice of teaching, remains an act of memorisation in South Africa.

We know that since 1994, with the fall of apartheid, there have been a few curriculum changes in South Africa. The curriculum reforms have attempted to move towards outcomes-based pedagogy and learner-centred practices. OBE requires schools to have clearly defined outcomes that they want learners to demonstrate. OBE focuses on what is to be learned – the outcomes. Learner-centred practices shift the focus of teaching from the teacher to the learner.

In this module, we will be discussing the educational changes that have taken place in South Africa in the first twenty years of democracy. We will go through the series of three curriculum reform efforts that have taken place in South Africa. Each of these reforms represents a different ideological and pedagogical policy. As we progress through the module, you will gain a more detailed understanding of these different ideological and pedagogical policies. For now, I want to turn our attention to what Hoadley refers to as a crisis in the curriculum field.

Knowledge, pedagogy, and the 'crisis' in the curriculum field

Hoadley informs us that the field of the curriculum has lost sight of its main object. She says that the main object is knowledge. Because the field of the curriculum is losing sight of its object, several scholars believe there is a crisis in the curriculum field. Hoadley maintains that curriculum change in South Africa was mainly concerned with socially just schooling for all. The emphasis in South Africa has been on who is getting access to knowledge. In focussing on the "who," we have neglected the "what." Hoadley says we are now focusing on what knowledge is valuable for inclusion in our curriculum.
