

Choose your units!

The Brüel & Kjær Class 2000 and Class 2000S analyzers (Type 2000 and 2000S) allow you to choose the appropriate units to suit your measurement needs. In fact, your measurements appear to be taken in the units you're measuring. The frequency spectrum can be scaled to match as well.

- Class 2000 (type 2000)
- Class 2000S (type 2000S)
- Class 2000S (type 2000S)
- Class 2000S (type 2000S)

The same bandwidth can be used to display signals for the two units which are working on the same system. The 2000S also automatically compensates for the units whenever the unit is switching.

Time-based and frequency-based spectra for a stationary, deterministic signal. The frequency spectrum is scaled to the unit being used in the study.

Deterministic signals

Stationary, deterministic signals are made up entirely of pure waves of the same frequency. The amplitude of the frequency spectrum is determined by the time bandwidth used in the study. The time bandwidth should match the resolution in frequency to make the resolution in frequency appear linear. Therefore, 2000 series that take the resolution equal to the time resolution are the most linear. If the time resolution is less than the time bandwidth, the time resolution is independent of the time width. However, the averaged frequency spectrum of a deterministic signal should be scaled to match the time resolution. This is the unit being used (2000).

The above figure shows the time-based and frequency spectrum for a stationary signal. The frequency spectrum is determined by the unit of time being used in the study.

The frequency spectrum shows the amplitude spectrum for each unit. The time-based spectrum shows the peak-to-peak amplitude of the signal, and the frequency spectrum shows the peak-to-peak amplitude of the signal.

Each type of time-resolving filter has a different number of frequency lines in the time bandwidth. This affects the magnitude of the peak measured through the filter. Because they are time-resolving, each type of time-resolving filter has a different resolution. The resolution is the value of the peak spectrum, using the unit or filter chosen, is correct and independent of the time-resolving filter.

Random signals

Random signals have a spectrum which is statistically distributed over frequency. Therefore, there is a statistical variation in the amplitude of the peak measured for the time resolution in the time bandwidth. To accurately measure, it is possible to average the spectrum of the time bandwidth by dividing the spectrum into more than one bandwidth. This resolution the result is a more square spectrum density, often called the power spectral density (PSD) which is a measure of the power per unit bandwidth.

Figure 1 shows the time-based and frequency-based spectrum for a stationary signal. The frequency spectrum is determined by the unit of time being used in the study.
