Are stock prices related to the price of gold? Is unemployment related to inflation? Is the amount of money spent on research and development related to a company's next month's profitability? Correlation was used in these questions, and there is one statistical technique more useful in these situations than correlation. Correlation is a statistical method that determines the degree of relationship between two different variables. It is often known as a "bivariate" statistic, with the increasing (or decreasing) relationship variable as "outcome." The two variables are usually a goal or success for a person or object. The relationship between any two variables can vary from strong to weak or none. When a relationship is strong, this means that knowing a person's or object's score on one variable helps to predict their score on the second variable, in other words, if a person has a high score on variable A (compared to all the other people) scores on B, then they are likely to have a high score on variable B (compared to the other people) scores on B. The latter would be considered a strong positive relationship. If the correlation or relationship between variable A and B is a weak one, then knowing a person's score on variable A, does not help to predict their score on variable B. One way to measure the strength of the correlation coefficient is that it can only range from -1.00 to $+1.00$. Any values outside this range are invalid. Here is a graph:
