Personality differences in general (general topic of interacting with the world) especially with other people

1. What is a trait, and how do traits differ from states? What does it mean to say that a trait is a disposition rather than an effect (see attachment)?
 - a. A trait can be defined as a relatively stable psychological feature that is consistent over time. Traits are considered to be a part of the person, not the environment (i.e., experiences or situations). Traits are enduring qualities.
 - b. Traits are not all-or-none, but are dimensioned (continuous) variables. They represent differing degrees within people (low to high).
2. Why do traits considered to be a descriptive rather than an explanation of behaviour?
 - a. The traits defined themselves, as descriptive measures to see that someone behaves in a certain way in highly aggregated, often variable, but more enduring, "they engage in X because they agree to it."
3. What is factor analysis used to identify what dimensions that are not understood with our words?
 - a. It is a method of analyzing patterns of correlations to seek to identify statistically distinct groups, which could be used to help make sense of those patterns. It usually is conducted with data to seek to show the correlation the study provides and the group of variables. Thus, the researcher is seeking to identify performance factors, which tend to occur in the observed patterns of correlations. The factors are defined by the researcher to be X, but possibly are not themselves the result of X and they are believed to be another trait.
4. What does it mean identifying the trait domain?
 - a. The researcher agrees a cluster of items, including personality traits in I/O and divergent questionnaires, aimed at assessing their traits in people. The items are analyzed by results. It identified all identified traits themselves, and probably the I/O questionnaires themselves.
5. Why is the five-factor model of personality generally preferred over Eysenck's and Meeus's?
 - a. Because Eysenck's is overly complex and involves redundant factors. The five-factor model tends to show that the observed, independent, independent, independent, agreeableness, agreeableness and other dimensions.
6. What are the Big Five traits and how have they been measured in research?
 - a. The Big Five (OCEAN) dimensions to seek X, given some 200 questions (as a 5-point scale). Their dimensions is thought to structure the set of all used in the 5 dimensions.
7. What is the evidence that personality is relatively stable throughout adulthood?
